

Sinclair's decision to air a biased documentary about a presidential candidate and label it as "news" is a blatant example of corporate power attempting to sway the upcoming election. It is unfair, indecent, and illegal to abuse the public airwaves to serve the interest of business over the interest of the public. Americans depend on news sources to gather facts to make their own decisions. It is not the media's right to decide for us. Sinclair has shown that it is partisan to a certain political agenda, and it has therefore revealed its transparency to the public. Media should be non-partisan, fair, and balanced. It should credit the American people with the intellectual capacity to make their own decisions, with unbiased information presented by media sources such as Sinclair. In this single action, Sinclair has launched itself into the spotlight of partisan politics. It is, and forever will be, a media outlet which I choose not to support.
